The impact of managing migration and integration on local and regional authorities (LRAs), especially in border regions, and the need to enhance support to LRAs from the EU institutions

Divani Apollon Palace | 10 Agiou Nikolaou Street | 166 71 Vouliagmeni, Greece

The migration landscape has changed dramatically overnight with millions of refugees fleeing Ukraine. This is in addition to the constant flows of refugees arriving in the EU countries situated in the Mediterranean. The current situation is a huge challenge and more challenges are to come. The European Union needs to act now by putting in place structured instruments to be well prepared for the upcoming challenges. Local and regional authorities in border regions are facing considerable pressure because of the unequal distribution of the responsibility of managing the current situation and thus, are seeking crucial support in order to help in better managing this challenge.

With the benefit of hindsight, what can we say about EU's preparedness and management of the current refugee crisis? What can be done to help Europe's mayors of EU border towns right now and which policies are needed to be better prepared for future migration and integration challenges?

Multilevel governance as a solution to holistic migration and integration friendly policies

The socio-economic impact of migration and everyday questions of reception and integration of migrants are strongly felt at local and regional level. The issue can be even more significant for the cities and regions that are close to points of entry into the EU as well as for the ones that receive many asylum seekers or refugees. Therefore, the most appropriate means to generate the necessary mix of measures and initiatives in order to achieve optimum results in the reception and integration of migrants and in the completion of the Common European Asylum System is a multilevel governance system, which takes into account the input and needs from all the levels - local, regional, national and European - of the same ecosystem so as to complement and reinforce one another.

However, two elements of the current framework stand in the way – 1. Top-down approach: vertical allocation of competences and the resulting hierarchy, and 2. Silo approach to policies affecting migrants, such as when housing, education, health and other essential public services are dealt with separately without the holistic understanding of their interlinkage.

How can we achieve migration and integration policies that are better calibrated to local and regional needs?

12:15 Session 2

Solidarity with cities and regions welcoming refugees – How best to support inclusive communities?

The 2015 refugee crisis was met with an outpouring of solidarity from individuals wanting to help. Many cities, regions, state governments, and civil society organisations provided a lifeline to the displaced and vulnerable, often despite administrative complexities and challenges. In 2019, the European Committee of the Regions launched its Cities and Regions for Integration of Migrants network to facilitate the exchange of good practices in helping migrants to be integrated into their new communities, collect data and disseminate information on the supporting funds.

In 2022, the European citizens panel adopted recommendations on how to improve migration policies in the context of the Conference on the Future of Europe. One of the recommendations calls for greater support to local and regional authorities receiving refugees. NGOs have also called for an EU fund which would be directly accessible to cities and regions participating in relocating and welcoming refugees.

In the wake of the war in Ukraine, can direct EU funding for cities and regions be implemented and in which other ways can city solidarity be achieved?
